PART II

Description of the program:

The Community Health Fellowship Program offers UT Southwestern medical students (MS1) the opportunity to be trained in community-based participatory research techniques, and then apply this knowledge in direct service to the community. Students accepted into the program will attend the Summer Research Institute (SRI) and work with a community-based clinic or health facility to complete a research project. Participation in this fellowship will also provide students with valuable clinical experience for treating at-risk patients. This is a great opportunity for students who are interested in research and community medicine.

Briefly explain your interest in this fellowship:

Please attach a description of the reasons for your interest in this fellowship, in community medicine, or in serving at-risk patients in underserved areas. If relevant, please include a description of any prior or anticipated educational, research and/or employment experiences related to research and community medicine. Include your resume or any supporting documents that you feel are relevant.

Please return a paper copy of this application and
